

This is an article about extracting features for computational thinking from block-based code. It discusses how an autograder can be used to assess student code written in Snap!. The autograder analyzes the structure of the code to determine if students are using concepts like abstraction and repetition. This approach is different from other autograders, which typically focus on correctness. The authors believe this method can be used to improve the teaching of computational thinking.